

ICE

COMPLEXITY: ★ ★ ★

The frozen wastes of Exen are uninhabitable by humans and would have surely sealed the fate of newborn twins Adrian and Roy Burton, who were brought to the planet by the Interstellar Command Legion of Exen, were it not for their hosts' intentions. The Legion has a history of adopting orphaned children from all across the galaxy to indoctrinate them into their honor-bound duty of protecting countless planets from the darkest of threats, and Adrian was destined to be their first human soldier. While he was injected with a combination of experimental serums intended to alter his physiology to survive the frigid environment of the Command Legion's homeworld, Roy was claimed by GEM (the Galactic Emissary of Mythora—the last protector of the Trinikey) in order to give her physical form in her fight against Astasia. The Legion was duty-bound to support GEM, and the prophets of Exen foresaw the twins reuniting when the time was right.

The experimental serum served Adrian well through his youth; he trained as hard as all the other species of soldiers on the frozen planet. However, in his teenage years, some unexpected side effects appeared in Adrian that the Legion could not explain. Years of exposure to extreme cold and the experimental serum running through his veins gave Adrian the ability to absorb moisture and create ice in various forms. After learning of this mutation, the Legion developed equipment for Adrian to focus his ability to project his frozen energy to maximum effect.

Thanks to his relentless training and amplified abilities, Adrian found himself promoted to an Interstellar Commander of Exen before his twenty-first birthday and in command of a legion of his own.
